FEATURE	DETAILS
Health Savings Account (HSA)	Accumulate savings from payroll prior to taxes, which can then be used for qualified medical expenses such as deductibles, copayments, and coinsurance. This can be used only if employee is covered by a high deductible health plan or a qualifying Affordable Care Act marketplace plan and has no disqualifying coverage. Contributions are limited, however. In 2018, the limit is set to $3,450 for self only, and $6,900 for family. Unused HSA funds rollover into the next year and earn non-taxable interest.
Health Reimbursement Account (HRA)	This is an employer-funded account used to pay for qualified medical expenses according to terms set by the employer.
Flexible Spending Account (FSA)	This is similar to the HSA except the qualifying medical expenses are more broadly defined but the accumulated savings does not roll over into the following year unless the employer provides either a 2.5-month grace period or allows $500 to carry over. Employers may contribute, but are not required to do so. An FSA provides reimbursement with proof of out-of-pocket medical expense and a statement that it has not been covered by your medical plan. The employer administers this plan.
How Employees Benefit	61% Employees are now contributing 61% more to their health care than they did 10 years ago. ¹
	$4,300 A family of four can expect to pay more than $4,300 a year in medical expenses not covered by insurance. ²
	$1,075 By putting that money into a CDHP, employees save $1,075 in taxes each year. ³
	$245,000 A 65-year-old couple who retired in 2015 needs nearly $245,000 to cover medical bills in retirement; help them start saving now. ⁴
